Dominique Moïsi, conseiller spécial à l'Ifri

Welcome to the last session of the fifth edition of the World Policy Conference. We have Northern Americans, Russians, and Asians on this panel, but I will give them the floor in alphabetical order. We have, above all, individuals representing themselves, with their own vision of where the world is going. I have given them one task and asked them one question, which is the following: to what extent have these two days changed your perception of where the world is going? From your own respective vantage points, what is the most important subject you would like to share with this audience as we are concluding? Our first speaker will be Han Sung-joo, former Foreign Minister of the Republic of Korea. Han, you have the floor.

Han Sung-Joo, ancien ministre des Affaires étrangères de la République de Corée

Thank you very much. It is not usual for Korea to speak before China, Russia, and the United States, but I will do that nevertheless.

It is the democratic dimension.
