

NICOLAS BARRÉ

Managing Director, Les Echos

Everybody is ready to start the discussion. We have a very interesting topic to discuss because it is complicated, it is complex and I think there are many conflicting opinions on this issue of whether firms have a nationality. The easy answer of course is yes, of course they have a nationality because there is always a headquarters located somewhere in a country, but then at the same time those firms tend to say that they are global, and it is true also because their customers are everywhere. I am talking about big firms who operate in sometimes over 100 countries, but they still have an origin in a country. They still have their own DNA and so this whole issue is complex, also in the context of crisis in some countries if not globally. Governments tend to have a different relationship with their big firms in each country, and in Europe in particular you see that kind of trend going on. Therefore there are lots of questions on whether big firms truly have a nationality or are truly global.