Executive Board member, Capgemini

Good afternoon. It is my honour to share the second Young Leaders session in the 10-year history of the World Policy Conference. The purpose of this session, as defined by Thierry, is that technology, in the hands of millennials, offers a fresh perspective on new opportunities and new ways of addressing today's challenges, and their order of priority, thus influencing the many policy agendas that we have been discussing over the past three days.

To shed this new light, we have successful entrepreneurs with us, four from the private sector, and one from the French public sector. These sectors have to work hand-in-hand. They will introduce themselves and share their thoughts based on what they have heard over the past three days and on their experience, and we will, of course, have time for a Q&A.
